A Novel Air-Ship. Peter C. Campbell, a watchmaker of Brooklyn, has made a model of a balloon ship which sails through the air in any diwill and WINDOW FRAMFS, MOLDINGS, &c. rection in which it is started. He has been experimenting more or less for more than HER, SHINGLES, LATHS, NAILS, LIME, ALCINED PLASTER and CEMENT.

NO. 25 NORTH UNION ST.,
ALEXANDRIA, VIRGINIA.

ALEXANDRIA, VIRGINIA. inventor of the telegraph, and Horace Greeley used to drop in and see him build his models. The other day he showed a model in actual operation. The watchmaker's shop is about forty feet long and twenty feet wide. Back of the shop is a room onethird as deep, in which the most conspicu-ous object is a big picture of the Brooklyn bridge, with Mr. Campbell's air-ship sailing gracefully above one of the towers. The most conspicuous part of the machine is an egg-shaped balloon, whose longer and horizontal diameter is 60 inches, and its shorter or upright diameter 30. It is made of light Japanese paper, ciled. It has a keel of silk, whose lower edge is kept straight by a strip of wood. At each end of this strip there is a small propeller. The lower part consists of a boat shaped arrangement, made of silk, framed in light wood. There is an eight bladed propeller at the stern, horizontal propeller beneath, and a rudder of silk at the bow. A wicker basket in the middle contains a clock work engine to work the propeller. There are silk wings on the side, shaped and attached somewhat like the wings of a bird, and capable of being set at almost any slant. It is intended to make the ship rise in the air, the balloon being relied on chiefly to keep the ship The stern propeller moves the ship forward or backward, same as a propeller of a steamboat. The two flat wings on either side of the basket, each seven inches wide, are used to gide the course also. Then at each end of the top ridge-pole is another propeller, which will control the ship's movements. There is also a thin, small propeller forward of the basket, and above it, for use in steering.

She questionially desired an invitation was left out in the ed her acquaintances, she even waylaid the postman to ask for missing letters, and then she called on the lady, only to find her "not at home." Something must be done immediately, but what? She wrote a letter full of sweetness and light, begging to be told if a certain rumor regarding the departure South of this lady was true, that she regretted deeply not seeing her the day previous, as she wished to give her some letters to de-lightful friends, who would be so very happy, &c., to entertain her. &c., and then she added that she would bring these missives herself on such an evening, mentioning the date of the party-to which she had not been asked. The return post brought her an answer, couched in the gentlest terms of regret, that the writer was not going South, and should therefore require no letters of introduction. Only that and nothing more. > CATS AS BED FELLOWS .- In reply to the query of a correspondent as to the popular belief that a cat will suck the breath of a leeping infant, Babylood says: "Dr. Tomlinson, of Chicago, dismisses the subject Socratically: "What good do you suppose in would do a cat to draw into its lungs breath which a human being has just exhaled? Nevertheless it may be said, with all respect for Dr. Tomlinson and no respect at all for superstition, that the warmth-loving cat has a way of preferring baby's crib as a sleeping place to any other bed or corner. If driven away, she will return stealthily sgain and again to the snug covert. She loves, furthermore, to nestle close to baby's body, as often as not thrusting her whiskered nose against the velvet cheek, pink and warm with sieep. Thus far, she may do no harm. But when she occasionally curls her bulk of five or six or eight pounds' weight upon the sleeper's heaving chest mischief may come of it. To escape the risk of this mischance, if for no other reason, keep pussy away from your slumbering baby. Indeed, he is best off without any bed-fellow.
